Our Lagoon is Not a Loo

Most people don't think twice about what happens to their poo once they've flushed the loo.

That's how it should be. We pay rates for municipalities to deal with sewage.

But it doesn't always work like that, does it?

Knysna's sewage management has been bad for years and when that happens, we can end up pouring shite into the most environmentally important estuary in South Africa.

Not to mention that if we pollute the estuary – or lagoon as locals call it – we mess up the very thing that underpins Knysna's economy: tourism.

You'd think it would be a no-brainer for any local council to ensure that sewerage works function properly, but sadly this has not been the case in Knysna. We've all seen sewage overflowing from manholes, and all know about sewage spills into the lagoon.

So thank heavens for the resident-based Knysna Infrastructure Group (KIG) that has stepped in to help sort it out.

KIG describes itself as "a community-driven infrastructure organisation with residents, businesses, technical specialists and Knysna Municipality to address critical infrastructure problems and protect the long-term health of the estuary".

Their funding comes from donations. It is no surprise that since they began in 2024, R2m of the R3.8m they've spent so far has been on Knysna's sewerage system.

KIG paid for an engineer to work at the sewerage plant but that ended in December 2025 because of a funding crunch.

KIG founder Eugene Vermaak said scarce funds meant the choice was between retaining the engineer or doing critical work on the pump stations. They chose the pump stations.

"We'd been running the waste water treatment plant for 18 months and it was reasonably stable, but that decision has now come back to bite us. The plant has gone backwards."

KIG realised they urgently needed an engineer back on site so set up a funding drive to raise R300,000 to pay for him. Good news is they've already raised R116,000. Fantastic!

In a separate move a Cape Town woman approached KIG and launched a second initiative - Save Our Knysna Lagoon – to raise R500,000 to "buy essential equipment to stop further raw sewage from entering the lagoon".

More good news: she has already raised R300,000, some from international donors. Brilliant!

Now I know there are people who say: "Rubbish! Why should residents raise funds? We pay rates and the municipality must do its job!"

True. But what if they don't? What if years of neglect has left the sewerage works in such a bad state that it will take many years to put it right? Do we stand back and watch raw sewage run down the streets or into the lagoon? Or do we pitch in and help?

Eugene believes fully in helping.

His argument: "We pay taxes to national government, so we should get free hospital treatment and proper policing. But that doesn't happen so we pay for medical aid and personal security systems. That's the reality," he said.

If you want to donate, go to KIG's website: kisg.org.za

As US political commentator Joy Reid says: "Local government is a gamble that can have disastrous consequences when it fails."
