Marrying a Tree and Other Tales

Backpacking in poorer countries can be both tough and a great experience. I especially enjoy travelling off the tourist route where local people are still open to foreigners.

I had one such experience years ago at a small town in Nepal. I noticed lots of little Nepali girls wearing beautiful long, red and gold dresses, gold jewellery and makeup heading into a building. I was curious so wandered over and peeped through the window. The room was filled with little girls dressed like this.

A woman saw me and beckoned me inside. She was friendly and said that the girls were wearing bridal clothes because they were "getting married to a tree". A tree? I was nonplussed, but our language barrier meant I couldn't find out more. It was beautiful, with chanting and singing.

I later found out it was the Ihi or Bel Bibaha ceremony of the Newar people where the girls are "married" to the Hindu god Lord Vishnu, represented by a bel fruit or wood apple – hence "marrying a tree".

This symbolic marriage has an interesting function: even if later in life her real husband dies, she is never regarded as a widow because of her first "marriage" to Lord Vishnu, considered immortal. That protects her from the stigma of widowhood and ensures that she is never burned on a funeral pyre when her husband dies and is cremated. I was so lucky to have seen part of it.

Sometimes, of course, the tables are turned and it is the traveller who becomes the object of interest to the locals.

After hiking in the Andes we had descended into Peru's high altitude jungle. No roads, just paths where people and laden donkeys moved between villages.

It was steamy and muddy, and we had been filthy for weeks.

At one village we asked if we could sleep on the floor of one of the houses. Better than a wet tent, but my word that place had fleas.

Before bed I asked the woman of the house: Donde esta el banyo? – where is the loo?

She pointed at the mountain slope. I must have looked puzzled because she sent her child to show the way. I was expecting a long drop but there was nothing, just a stretch of scree, tumbled stones dotted with piles of poo. By this time almost every child in the village had come to watch. What could I do, I was bursting?

My friend had a kikoi around her neck that she took off to make a screen. I squatted down behind it, but a group of little boys, not to be cheated out of the spectacle of watching a gringo lady wee, ran up the rocks so they could peer around the kikoi.

We were in a really remote part of Peru, so perhaps the kids had never seen a gringo before, well not with her broeks down.

So ja, backpacking on a shoestring can be hard work sometimes but for me it beats organised tours hands down.

As GK Chesterton put it: "The traveller sees what he sees, the tourist sees what he has come to see."
